Dr. Jeffrey Levine

Jeffrey Levine is a Rochester native. He received his BS in Biology at SUNY Geneseo. He attended Columbia University College of Dental Medicine, receiving his DDS in 2018. He continued at Columbia University for his postdoctoral training in endodontics and completed his residency in 2020. Since then, he has worked full-time as an endodontist and is passionate about giving patients positive experiences and saving teeth.

Course Description

Root canal therapy can save a tooth that would otherwise be lost. However, the intricate interplay between microbiology, physiology, and anatomy means that some endodontic treatments will fail. This presentation will examine the factors that contribute to these failures and the lessons we can derive from them. Attendees will be able to apply the information presented to their treatments, to increase endodontic success.

Learning Objectives

- Identify the foundational principles of endodontic pathology
- Explore root canal anatomy and how this affects endodontic success
- Compare rotary file effectiveness at cleaning canal systems
- Understand fracture types and causes and how they affect endodontic success
